

David Crystal Day

Language BLANK Literature: from Conjunction to Preposition

The study of language and the study of literature have long been separated and are often treated as if they were antagonistic domains, both in mother - tongue and in foreign - language teaching. This talk argues for the integration of the two domains, by focusing on the notion of linguistic creativity which underlies both, and providing performance illustrations from several literary genres

Where have all the dialect words gone?

This talk reflects on the selection of lost dialect words David Crystal made for his book, The Disappearing Dictionary (2015), and wonders if any of them are still being used.